through and through, combining into a single whole all the different systems that may exist on either side of the river Lethe. The laws that govern the very lowest strata of life, merge gradually into higher and higher ones, as we rise to higher and higher rungs in the evolutional ladder. It is at the meeting point of two distinct strata that doubts arise, as to which is which, and it becomes difficult to distinguish between stratum and stratum layer and layer, genus and genus, species and species. Of the tad~pole of the ponds, when it is just coming out as a frog, it may be questioned whether it is a tadpole or a frog, but not so when fully developed. Such also happens with us, when we are passing through periods of transition and change, whether as individuals, or societies, or even as an entire people and it becomes difficult to anticipate the lines of procedure with regard to such, so that in the very extreme of cases, the doubt seems to reach the very far end of crea-tion, and disturbs the partition line that exists

l>etween the earthly and the unearthly, the manifest and the unmanifest, the visible and the invisible around us.
